As designers and developers alike, we tend to present our clients with prototypes, mockups, designs and finished products that are always at their best. In spending so much time focused on the best case scenario we leave our sites' failure points to chance and end up with nasty surprises when things end up in a lesser state. Our duty, as builders of the web, is to ensure that our designs support failures every bit as gracefully as they do successes, be it in layout, design, content or interaction.
